

Wash Fisherman convicted and fined £500 for illegal fishing

On the 29th of March 2007 King's Lynn Magistrates heard the Master of a Wash commercial fishing vessel plead guilty to fishing without the authority of a Wash Fishery Order Licence on the 10th of September 2006.

The case was brought against the fisherman by Eastern Sea Fisheries Joint Committee. A Fishery Officer boarded the vessel when it landed its catches of cockle in the King's Lynn Fisher Fleet. The Fishery Officer ascertained that the Master of the vessel did not have a licence issued by the Joint Committee to fish the Regulated Cockle beds within the Wash.

Matthew Mander, Clerk and Chief Fisheries Officer at Eastern Sea Fisheries Joint Committee said:

“The Wash is an important marine site with significant shellfisheries supporting both fishermen and the wider ecosystem. The Wash is recognised as a site of high environmental value and as such is afforded significant protection through legislation. The Joint Committee takes its fisheries management and protection seriously as this helps to ensure the sustainable utilisation of marine resources within this European Marine Site.”

“Illegal fishing seriously undermines the Joint Committee's management of these important fisheries and in turn this places the future, for the vast majority of Wash fishermen, in jeopardy.”

Notes to editors

- 1) Fishing activity may be regulated in relation to the quantities of fish, area in which they are caught, the species involved and the gear used. It is important that fishermen comply with these rules.
- 2) Enforcement of EU, UK and local fisheries regulations on British registered vessels within the Eastern Sea Fisheries Joint Committee district is conducted by Fishery Officers from Eastern Sea Fisheries operating from one of the Joint Committee's fishery patrol vessels.
- 3) Information of Eastern Sea Fisheries Joint Committee and the work it does can be obtained from www.esfjc.co.uk
- 4) The Wash is recognised as a site of high environmental value and as such is afforded significant protection. The Wash is designated as a: Site of Special Scientific Interest (SSSI), Special Area of Conservation (SAC), Special Protection Area (SPA), Ramsar site and part of it is also a National Nature Reserve. In light of these designations ESFJC has a lead role in ensuring that the environmental importance of the site is not compromised by commercial fishing activities.
